Once upon a time there was a little vole. He went by the name of Peter. This vole named Peter lived in a quiet, wooded district of London. More precisely, he lived in a tiny mouse hole inside of Mr Watson's house, which itself was located in this London district. Although Peter was living alone and leading a modest lifestyle, his days were spent joyfully and were packed with painstaking but rewarding work and tasks. One of his daily occupations was the sewing of beautiful fabrics. Isn't that something? Who would have thought that a tiny vole could be capable of sewing beautiful garments – or any kind at all, for that matter?

Each day once he'd have woken up, and after having drunken his morning tea, Peter Vole would already have set off to work, that is, he could at that time be found twirling his puny sewing needles between his tiny fingers. He'd only sell his fabrics to his closest friends, but doing so was sufficient enough for him to live a humble but happy life.

One day during the onset of winter, the tiny vole took great pleasure in sewing warm clothes for his friends, whom he thought would be in need of the former and would accept them gladly.

But in the meantime, several new shops opened up in the city, flooding London with the newest and most beautiful garments as a result. All and sundry in the city – Peter Vole’s friends included – stood in awe at the fantastic choice of distinguished wares.

Mister Dormouse happened to boast about the most renowned and well-known store. He was an esteemed, honourable citizen, who was in possession of invaluable assets. No one would ever have dared to question his authority – once he'd say something, his word would become the law.

One afternoon Peter was waiting for his friends for a tea party but, much to his dismay, they didn't show up.
